Bruce: Keiko, what did you want to be when you were a child?

Keiko: I wanted to be a nurse.

Bruce: Really? Why did you give it up?

Keiko: My mother said I couldn't be a nurse. It's a hard job. You sometimes have to stay overnight looking after the patients. My mother said I was too weak to be a nurse.

Bruce: I see. But now you sometimes stay up all night preparing for classes as a teacher, and you are doing well.

Keiko: Thanks. Looking after the students is rewarding, too. Bruce, what did you want to be?

Bruce: I wanted to be a world-famous pianist.

Keiko: Wow! How many years have you been playing the piano?

Bruce: Three days.

Keiko: What? How can you be a world-famous pianist, then?

Bruce: Well, we are free to imagine things, aren't we?

Keiko: Sure. But you know, if you don't try, you can't be a world-famous anything. How did you get the idea of being a pianist in the first place?

Bruce: My mother wanted to be a pianist when she was a child and she repeatedly told me how wonderful it would have been if she had become a pianist.

Keiko: Now I see. So you were influenced by her words.

Bruce: You too were influenced by your mother when you gave up becoming a nurse.

Keiko: True. But isn't it funny when you think about what you're doing now?

Bruce: What do you mean?

Keiko: You are using your fingers all the time on the computer keyboard just like a pianist.

Bruce: That's true. Only I'm not world-famous.

Keiko: But you work for a world-famous company. We both realized our childhood dreams in a way.
