- Woman: Excuse me. I lost my smartphone. Can you help me?
- Attendant: OK, ma'am. Do you remember where you left it?
- Woman: I think I left it by the ticket vending machine over there, but it's not there anymore.
- Attendant: OK. When did you leave it?
- Woman: About two hours ago.
- Attendant: All right. Then can you describe your phone? Color? Case?
- Woman: Oh, it's a pink smartphone and the case is red with a big face of a dog printed on the back.
- Attendant: Red case with a dog. OK. I'll look it up on the lost and found item list online.
Hmm. No smartphone with a dog case, I'm sorry.
- Woman: Oh, dear. I can't even find my way back to my hotel without my phone.
- Attendant: Are you staying near Shinjuku?
- Woman: Yes, but I forgot the exact name of the hotel. It's all in my smartphone.
- Attendant: I see. You know what? Sometimes it takes a little time for lost items to appear at the lost and found. And it takes some time to get listed. So, you might like to come back in a few hours and try again. It might come up later.
- Woman: Oh, OK.
- Attendant: Wait a minute, ma'am. Is there anything else on the phone case apart from the dog? Like numbers?
- Woman: Yes! 67.
- Attendant: And the dog is not a cute puppy but a rather wild picture, is it?
- Woman: Yes! It's a copy of a street art figure. It's by a famous street artist of my country, Mexico. The dog looks really fierce.
- Attendant: Ah! Then, here you are. "A smartphone in a red case with a picture of a monster and number 67." Found at Shinjuku Station.
- Woman: Oh, that's it! Thank you! Thank you!
- Attendant: Good. Then I'll write you a map to get to the lost and found office.
You'll need to show them your ID and fill in a form there.
- Woman: Thank you so much. I've heard that Japan is a wonderful country where lost things come back. Now I know it's true.
- Attendant: You're welcome. Have a nice day.
